Crownpoint Justice Complex Features Five Program Buildings

OFMC and the Navajo Nation share in funding the 112,375 square foot complex.

Video: Watch the DSRM Safety Inspection.

Both the Navajo Nation and OFMC funded the complex.

The Eastern Navajo Diné Justice Center in New Mexico consists of five key buildings, each with a different function:

- Courts, 23,811 square feet;
- Law Enforcement, 12,158 square feet;
- Peacemaking, 2,066 square feet ;
- Juvenile Detention, 6,912 square feet; and
- Adult Corrections/Detention, 29,106 square feet.

Each building is designed to facilitate the Navajo Nation's vision of justice and peacemaking with rehabilitation, not punishment, the focus.

The two-story Courts building consists of three courtrooms and related administrative areas. The Law Enforcement building has space for administration, investigation, patrol, evidence storage, armory and dispatch/communications. Included in the Peacemaking program is a traditional Navajo hogan. Juvenile Detention's focus is on rehabilitation, with visiting and rehabilitative spaces.

The Adult Corrections/Detention building has male and female wings, each with minimum and medium/maximum security areas, day rooms and medical isolation rooms. There are offices for staff who work with detainees, such as public defenders, paralegals, advocates, social workers, substance abuse workers, psychologists, nurses, physicians and religious personnel. There also are rooms for individual or group therapy, a law library and a video arraignment office.

Restrooms and other service areas are ADA compliant; some are detention grade while others are for public use. The Justice Complex is designed to conserve water and energy.

Justice Complex Rises Next to Pine Ridge Detention Center

OFMC is funding the construction of a Justice Complex (right) next to the existing Pine Ridge, S.D., Detention Facility, which was funded by the U.S. Department of Justice.
